James Brocket Managing Partner – Europe

One of the reasons we developed the Calibre One Index way back in 2003, was to try and draw comparison between the European and US tech venture capital scenes. Well, just at the time when European governments are waking up to the notion that providing an environment conducive to helping start-ups flourish is potentially a good thing for the economy, the figures in this edition of the Index reveal that the gulf today between the US and Europe, is wider than it has ever been.

There are many reasons for this, and most are so obvious as to not warrant a mention, but there are a couple, in particular, that are:

1. Frothy valuations

It is a simple fact that valuations for tech companies are higher in the US. They therefore are able to close much bigger investment rounds than their European counterparts. There are many pundits way better qualified than me to pass comment on the valuations of the current clutch of companies such as Facebook, Groupon, Twitter, Zynga and many others. However, I still have vivid memories of the bursting of the dotcom bubble in 2001. Dissenting voices back then were accused of 'just not getting it'. Shortly afterwards the sector went into a decline so sharp and violent that all who witnessed it were sure that the same thing could never happen again. Sure, these companies differ in many ways from their analogues in 'Web 1.0', not the least of which is that most are producing very significant revenues and are still growing very fast. To describe these valuations as 'frothy' may prove to be an understatement.

2. Flipping companies

As valuations climb, it brings into focus the lost opportunities for Europe where some of our best companies morph from European to US companies, and go on to be categorised as such for subsequent VC rounds and then exits. Obviously, one of the great attractions to these companies is the greater valuations they can expect in the US.

Plastic Logic was not long ago the pride of Cambridge, this quarter it closed $200m of Russian venture capital funding and was being hailed as a 'Mountain View based developer of ereader technologies'. Also, in the same month as AppSense came in at #12 in the Sunday Times Profit Track 100 – the list of the UKs leading private companies, I read another article referring to it as a 'New York based software company'. Its website seems to confirm this. These companies are therefore now categorised as US companies in the Index. If they had not made the change then the numbers for the UK would prove to be much improved.

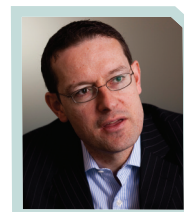

Whilst, if you're batting for Europe, it makes difficult reading, one thing this edition of the Calibre One Index does show is that the global tech sector is powering ahead – and that is great for everybody. Europe has a lot of work to do if it is to grow, and retain, its prize technology businesses, rather than just accepting its current position as an 'incubator' preparing great companies for their relocation to the US.

Richard Brennan Partner – Europe

The US has surged ahead with c. 50% more capital invested than last quarter. Europe meanwhile is down 10% with particularly poor quarters in the UK and France, down c. 30% and 80% respectively.

History shows that Q1 is rarely a strong quarter in Europe, where we seem to be unusually slow in ‘coming out of the blocks’ in the New Year. In the US conversely, the first quarter of the year is consistently the strongest quarter.

As is noted in the Foreword, the picture is distorted somewhat by the fact that some significant funding rounds have been closed by UK based companies such as Plastic Logic and Appsense, moving to the US. The UK market remains tough from a fund-raising perspective – both for VCs and their companies.

James Brocket Managing Partner – Europe

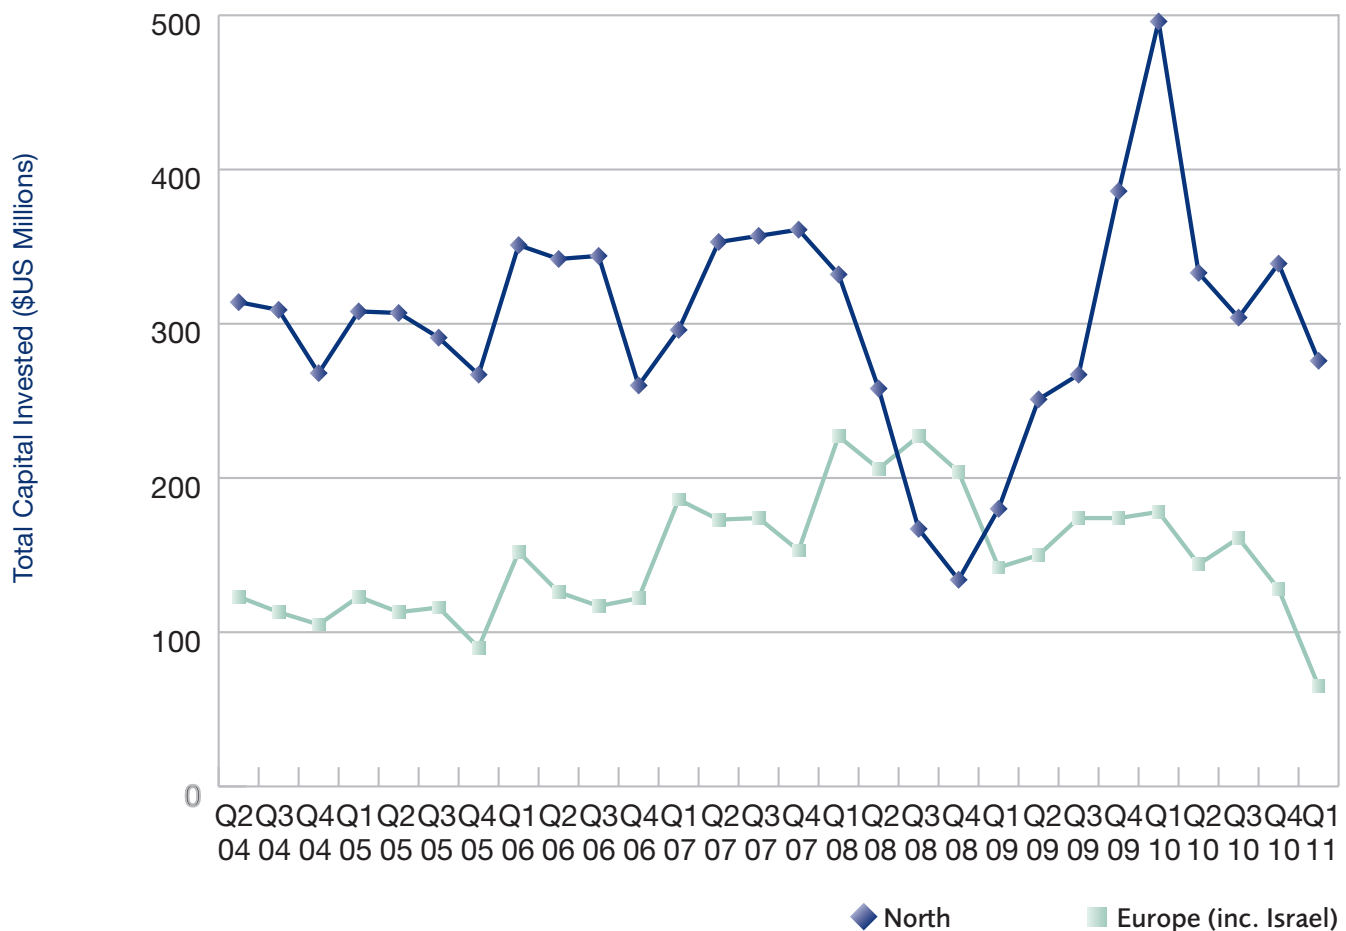

Interestingly, the number of investments is substantially down in every major territory, including the US.

Venture capital in Europe is wrestling with some major structural challenges and this results in a particularly difficult market for A and B rounds. Many early-stage VCs of old are now 'Growth' investors – leaving relatively few VCs focused on earlier stage companies.

It is interesting to note that even with the free flow of venture funding in the US there is a c. 20% decline in the number of investments in Q1 2011. There are far fewer A and B rounds closing here also, and this is likely to impact in the future.

Tom Barnes Managing Partner – USA

The average investment size is up significantly in most territories, the most notable shift being in the US, up c. 70% to $23m. Europe also grew significantly, up 55% to $12m.

Clearly the figures are slightly skewed by the enormous funding rounds closed by Facebook and Groupon, but despite this effect it is clear that there is an underlying trend towards investment dollars being steered more towards later stage companies.

Today, Silicon Valley feels busier than ever. As companies grow in size and confidence, so too does their need to hire great leaders to take them forward. Both our Palo Alto and San Francisco offices are seeing an unprecedented demand for our services.
